SPATIAL VARIATIONS

The spatial variations in the distribution of the population are a result of the unevenness of the land surface. The population is concentrated in the lowlands and valleys, where the land is fertile and the climate is favorable. The highlands and mountains are sparsely populated, due to the rugged terrain and the harsh climate. The population density is also higher in the coastal areas, where the land is flat and the climate is mild. The spatial variations in the population are a result of the unevenness of the land surface and the unevenness of the climate.
